Crime and Mystery Fiction by Nebraska Writers

In Nebraska, the historical giants of crime fiction are Mignon Good Eberhart (1899-1996) and Jim Thompson (1906-1977). Eberhart was a classic creator of fictional detectives who combined her mysteries with elements of the romance novel. With some 59 novels to her credit, she is the most prolific Nebraska novelist ever. By the late 1940s Eberhart was the third highest earning woman mystery writer in the world, after Agatha Christie and Mary Roberts Rinehart.

Jim Thompson's writing had a much sharper bite than Eberhart's. Growing up in Oklahoma and in the Sandhills around Burwell, Nebraska, Thompson knew a dark, unforgiving world of labor and want. Thompson came to himself as a writer in Lincoln in the 1930s, under the tutelage of Lowry Wimberly. His writing explored the dark side of the American experience, the inner world of the criminally insane, or the fatal inspirations of a half-formed, trapped, and uncomforted American everyman. Readers and critics have a greater appreciation for his work today than they did during his lifetime.

If Mignon Eberhart's heroines all find their way from some exotic setting, to middle class dreams and ideals, Jim Thompson's stories corrode middle class dreams and distort them into nightmares.

Nebraska's contemporary writers of crime and mystery fiction include writers now recognized as among the genre's most popular and distinguished American practitioners. Among them: Richard Dooling, Sean Doolittle, Julie Kaewert, Alex Kava, Harley Jane Kozak, Lise McClendon, William J. Reynolds, David Wiltse and Don Winslow.

Here, together with works by Eberhart and Thompson, is a sampling of crime and mystery fiction from Nebraska writers.
